Joe Colombano is currently at the United Nations as a Senior Officer and Economic Advisor in the Executive Office of the Secretary-General. Joe is an economist with fifteen years of experience in emerging markets, and his work focuses on addressing the macroeconomic challenges of low- and middle-income countries. Joe’s experience covers a wide range of sectors and regions, including international finance and banking in Central and Eastern Europe, Asia, and Sub-Saharan Africa. Previous to his current position, Joe built a career in development finance, first at the World Bank in Washington DC., and later in London, at the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, including as advisor to its Board of Directors. As a banker, Joe worked with corporate parties and governments to co-invest in project finance transactions in the infrastructure sector in the Former Soviet Union. He also lived in the Congo, where he advised the Central Bank on monetary policy. Joe has published frequently on economics and development. His new book "Re-Developing America: Global Perspectives on America’s 21st Century Challenges" is forthcoming from University of Pennsylvania Press in 2012. He received his graduate degrees from the University of Warwick in the UK and Harvard Kennedy School in the US.
